Lakshmi Holdström's The Inner Courtyard (1990), by contrast, is refreshing in its diversity. As a collection of short stories by Indian women, both within India and from abroad, in English and in translation, it provides a glimpse into the multiplicity of female narratives during the twentieth century.

The Inner Courtyard is a space one can still find in a few homes across India, an area beyond which women will not go unescorted by men. Geographically, our houses may be different now; we live in cities or even in small flats and cramped places, but these women's spaces get translated even into modern architecture.

Courtyard homes existed as far back as 3,000 BC in India and China, in ancient Roman villas, and in traditional Mexican haciendas. Islamic architecture made extensive use of inner courtyards - the style is poetically called handasat al hijab, or 'architecture of the veil' - with modest exteriors that gave little away of the often exquisite beauty inside.

In inner-city areas where homes are all but forced to make every inch of land count, central courtyards kill several birds with one stone. That's because internal courtyards flood narrow homes with natural light while the surrounding walls of the building seal out city noise and create a private retreat away from the prying eyes of overly-curious neighbours.
